Paying for college is one of the largest investments a family will ever make. It's an investment that's not risk free and one that's too important to leave unprotected. Research confirms current and future college students are highly confident in the value of higher education, but at the same time, there is a low awareness of financial risks, amid affordability concerns.

The 2024 Lumina-Gallup State of Higher Education Report found:

More than one in three students currently enrolled have considered stopping out of their degree or credential program within the last six months.

Among those considering stopping out, 64% say emotional stress or mental health concerns are significant reasons - more than twice the percentage who say cost of their program is what may cause them to stop out.

Nearly all (94%) of adults say at least one kind of postsecondary credential is very valuable.

Nearly 75% of students re-enroll or plan to re-enroll in college after a covered withdrawal.

According to a GradGuard June, 2023 survey.

Despite these obstacles, college is worth it when students graduate. College is a large investment and it's vital students and families understand the costs, refund policies, and risks associated with it.
